Ogres on Hiraeth are dangerous, if uncommon, monsters known to travel through the winter frost in search of unconsecrated dead. They reside year-round in the frigid north, where they are known to come into contact with Sirayem tribes with relative frequency. As a result, most of their names are given by the Sirayem, who name them in their style. Ogres are territorial outside of their winter roaming period, so it is uncommon to encounter two in the same area.

He-Eats-Us - One of the largest named ogres, he wanders the northern coasts. Not a picky eater, known to kill outside of predation.

Vultures-Gather - Recognizable by the carrion birds that follow her around. She's a messy eater, but seems to prefer larger prey than humans.

Ninth-Name-of-Death - Smaller than most ogres. Typically pursues and kills everything he comes across.

Sleeps-Beneath-No-Roof - Notable for sleeping under the open sky rather than in caves or ravines. More passive than most ogres.

Drinks-From-Skulls - Likes to turn corpses into trinkets and tools, reserving animal skulls most notably as cups. Often preceded by an offal stench.

Keeps-the-Teeth - Known for removing the teeth from her prey. Finding piles of teeth in the North is indicative of being in her territory.

Last-Thing-the-Emperor-Saw - She legendarily slew a Morivian emperor and his entourage during a campaign in the North. Frequently sought by Morivian bounty hunters, not yet with any success.